

Do 16

✓ M I L T O N

VINDICATED

FROM THE

C H A R G E S

O F

Mr L A U D E R.

THE NEW YORK

LIBRARY

OF THE

ALBANY

UNIVERSITY

OF THE STATE

OF NEW YORK

ALBANY

NEW YORK

NEW YORK

NEW YORK

ZOILOMASTIX:
OR, A
VINDICATION
OF
MILTON,

From all the invidious CHARGES of
Mr WILLIAM LAUDER.

WITH
Several NEW REMARKS
ON PARADISE LOST.

Conamur tenues grandia. HOR.

By R. RICHARDSON, B. A. late of Clare-Hall, Cambridge.

LONDON:
Printed for M. COOPER, in Pater-noster Row.
M.DCC.XLVII.

NOT FOR SALE
OF 4
VINDICATED

MILTON

FROM THE MUSEUM OF THE MILITARY

WITH SPECIAL

PARADISE

CHURCH

BY RICHARDSON

LONDON
Printed for M. Cooper, in Pall Mall

P R E F A C E.

*I*N all ages when a great genius has appeared, there have not been wanting invidious Critics and Detractors to soil the lustre of their writings, or even deprive them of their just property in their own productions. Was antiquity silent, our own times would furnish us with examples. Their mean assiduity and alertness would wrest Mr Pope's Essays from him, and falsely insinuate that Mr Addison's Cato was but a copy, and that

Garth did not write his own Dispensary.

Virgil has his Macrobius, Bavius, Mævius; Homer his Zoilus; and both, their French Critics. Milton would not be equal to those great authors in every respect, was he not attack'd with equal envy.

Dr. Bentley's attempt was to wipe away the (supposed) defects of Paradise Lost, but Mr Lauder's (must I mention him *him with that learned critic?) to blot and daub it with detraction. The Critic's endeavour was more generous, as it proceeded from an esteem for the Poet; the Detractor's base and ungenerous, as it is tainted with rancour, spleen and envy. Mean officious zeal to strip the deserved laurel from his own countryman, to grace the brows of a few obscure foreigners! Was it for this, that their works have engrossed his attention for these * seven years past; that*

—— He fill'd his head

With all such reading as was never read?

If it was for this end---'Tis no wonder that the Iliad and Æneid were neglected; for those noble works would have taught him to commend, not accuse the best of poets.

But it may be said,

Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis
Tempus eget. ——

I have not the vanity to think that the fol-

* Gent. Mag. Aug. p. 364 D.

P R E F A C E.

iii

following Letters are a perfect vindication of Milton; many arguments might be alledg'd, which may have escaped my observation; many proofs brought, which may be beyond the sphere of my reading. They were only intended to excite the admirers of our author to exert themselves in his cause. But as none have given a particular answer to all the charges that MrLauder has brought against the Poet, and as he has declined his future charges, I think it is highly necessary to examine the validity of what he has asserted already, lest he should imagine what he has alledg'd, unanswerable.

As my first letter (which was publish'd in the Gentleman's Magazine for July last) has met with approbation from the learned, I was encouraged to proceed in the further Vindication of Milton against Mr Lauder. My second Letter was scarce finished, before Mr Lauder's answer to the first, obliged me not only to defend Milton, but myself.

These Letters were wrote at several times, times, and intended to be inserted occasionally in the Gentleman's Magazine; but as they are at length become a work too large for Mr Urban's monthly collection, they now appear (what I little expected) in a pamphlet.

If any thing in this attempt may tend to illustrate any part of Paradise Lost, or vindicate its great Author, I shall think my time well bestowed. If thro' inadvertency or inexperience (the common frailty of humanity) I have fallen into any error, I hope the good intent will compensate for the defects; for I do not accuse but defend the greatest poet of our nation. And if I am sometimes a little severe with my opponent, I must desire the reader to consider that I am engaged in the Vindication of MILTON.

A
VINDICATION
OF
MILTON, &c.

LETTER I.

Harapha.] ——— Thou'rt a revolter and a robber.
Samson.] Tongue-doughty giant, how dost thou prove me these?

Milton's Samson Agonistes.

Mr URBAN,

SOME time has elapsed since your correspondent, Mr Lauder, first published his wonderful Essay on Milton's Imitation of the Moderns. I deferr'd giving you my private thoughts on it, both in expectation of seeing his arguments particularly refuted by a more able hand, and in hopes of your correspondent's fulfilling his promise to justify his assertions more largely in a pamphlet*; which he has declin'd, and for his own credit I would have him decline, unless he brings better specimens, than he has in the Magazine for January, p. 24, April, p. 189, or more candid asser-
 B tions

* See Gent. Mag. Vol. xvii. p. 82.

tions than in that of February, p. 82. I shall at present only consider the former; and if this meets with approbation, shall give you my thoughts on his further charges against Milton.

Before we examine the particular passages of the two poems of Milton and Masenius, I think it would not be improper to consider them in general. That of Masenius was publish'd (according to January Magazine, p. 2.) in the year 1654, or 1661, and Paradise Lost in 1667, and shewn as actually finished in 1665*. And 'tis agreed by all, that this divine poem was wrote between the year 1665, and the year of his blindness 1650; and that he had long before chose the Fall of Man for his subject, is plain from the plans of his hand-writing in Trinity College library, and from his own words;

——— This subject for heroic song
Pleas'd me long chusing, and beginning late,
Par. Lost, B. ix. v. 25.

From hence it clearly appears that Milton's poem was at least begun before that of Masenius was publish'd; which is sufficient for our present purpose, for the passages in question are in the beginning of the poems of their respective authors. Nor, in my opinion, is Milton more indebted to Masenius for his plan (which to me seems to be widely different, considering their subject was the same) than for the beginning of his poem.—Besides, it seems wonderful ful to me, that from the year in which Paradise Lost was publish'd to this time (which is 80 years) no Bentley, no Hearne, no penetrating genius but Mr Lauder should be so eagle-eye'd as to hit upon this rare discovery; and, especially at the time when Masenius was extant, when Milton was expos'd to * darkness and evil tongues, that no public enemy should brand him with plagiarism.

* Mr John Richardson's Life of Milton, p. cxi.

But before I come to particulars, I must observe, that Virgil himself was not free from the like calumnies. Macrobius positively taxes that most noble poet with having translated, almost word for word, the whole 2d book of the Æneas from Pisander†, and the 4th from Apollonius Rhodius;‡ which invidious calumny † Dr Trapp has proved to be absolutely false. And, I think, we may justly apply Mr Voltaire's words in the defence of Virgil to the vindication of our much injur'd poet Milton||, “ That the only answer which is to be made “ to such discoveries, is, that such works are “ too

* Paradise Lost, B. vii. v. 25.

† ‘ Everfionem Trojæ, cum Sinone suo, & equo ligneo, cæterisque omnibus quæ librum secundum faciunt, a Pisandro pene ad verbum transcripserit.’

Saturn. Lib. v. Cap. 2.

‡ ‘ De Argonauticorum quarto, quorum scriptor est Apollonius, librum Æneidos suæ totum pene formaverit.’

Saturnal. Lib. v. Cap. 17.

† In his note to B. ii. v. 16. of the Æneid. See likewise his note to B. iii. v. 719.

|| Essay on the Epic poetry of the European nations.

“ too great master-pieces of art to be but co- “ pies.”

Let us now consider the particular passages of the two poets, and first the proposition: What that is, will be best known by consulting the following verses of Vida.

*Vestibulum ante ipsum, primoque in limine semper
 Prudentes leviter rerum fastigia summa
 Libant, & parcis attingunt omnia dictis
 Quæ canere statuere.*——— Lib. ii.

This as a rule the noblest bards esteem,
 To touch at first in gen’ral on the theme;
 To hint at all the subject in a line,
 And draw in miniature the whole design.

Mr Pitt’s Translation.

If then the proposition is a short sketch of the contents of the whole poem, or the poem in miniature; and as Milton and Masenius wrote on the very same subject, how is it possible, unless they deviated from the true rules of poetry (and Milton was too great a judge to do so) that there should not be some similitude in their thoughts? But if the impartial reader carefully compares the beginning of the two poems, he will find that nothing could be more wide and different than their manner of expression, considering the thought and subject were common to them both; and will agree with your judicious correspondent, p. 68 B.
 “ That if Milton had ever seen Masenius, and
 “ in any sort attempted to borrow from him,
 “ his poem would neither have been the same,
 “ nor

“ nor so good as it is.” Masenius, in his proposition, neither mentions the forbidden fruit, nor the loss of Paradise, which (according to his marginal heads) he ought to have done, as they are constituent parts of his poem; these Milton judiciously inserts in his proposition, and adds, Till one greater man, &c. of which there is not so much as a thought in Masenius.

*Quæ citbaræ quondam nervos, artemque regebas
Jeshadæ, &c.* MASENIUS.

—— Didst inspire
That shepherd, &c. MILTON.

Either these passages are not parallel, or that Shepherd, i. e. Moses, must be David. Here is another instance of Milton's judgment (who intended to sing

In the beginning how the heav'ns and earth
Rose out of Chaos.——)

to mention Moses, who relates how “ In the “ beginning God created the heaven and the “ earth,” and whose steps he intended to follow in his sublime description of the creation. Was I of Mr Lauder's clan, I should rather think that Cowley, in the beginning of his Davidis, has copied this last sentence of Masenius, rather than Milton.

Non mihi Pieridum lymphæ, Cirrhæque recessus, &c.

Unfortunately for himself, unfortunately for his beloved author, does this gentleman quote this place ;

place ; for there is not a syllable like it in Milton. And now Masenius himself must be taxed with imitating the moderns, for it very much resembles the following lines of Caspar Barlaeus *.

*Cyrrha vale, Phœbique domus, non Castalis amnis,
Non levat ipsa meam Phocidos unda sitim.
Tu mihi, Calliope, &c.*

But here Masenius shall have a more candid treatment from me than Milton has met with lately ; for I cannot persuade myself to hold this maxim, “ That no body must pretend to “ write any thing of his own, because another “ has wrote before him.”

As Masenius and Milton were both christian poets, and their subject founded on the same parts of holy writ, 'twas necessary that they should invoke that spirit which directed the divine pen-man. Milton's great judgment in this case has already been mentioned.

The foregoing arguments on the proposition will serve in general for the invocation. What now deserves our more particular consideration are these passages :

————— *Omnia namque
Te ductrice patent ; rerumque occulta tueris
Prima opifex, nostræ spectatrix prima ruinæ !*

MASENIUS.

Instruct me, for thou know'st ; thou from the first
Wast present. —————

MILTON.

These I confess to be parallel, tho' not imitated
from

* P. 338. Edit. Elzevir, Anno 1631.

from Masenius, who, with Milton, closely follows the steps of Homer.

Ὑμεῖς γὰρ Θεοὶ ἐσθε, ΠΑΡΕ΄ΣΤΕ τε ΎΙΣΤΕ τε
ΠΑ΄ΝΤΑ. Iliad. II. 485.

— And with mighty wings outspread
Dovelike sat'ft brooding on the vast abyfs,
And mad'ft it pregnant.—

I cannot pafs over these beautiful lines (tho' somewhat foreign to our purpose) which may be overlook'd by an ordinary reader. The poet here alludes to the 3d chapter, ver. 22, of St Luke, where the holy spirit is represented in a bodily appearance, annexing the idea of brooding, which is imply'd in that expressive word of Moses, מְרַחֵם,* which our translation renders mov'd. Is this too imitated from Masenius? Or rather, has that Jesuit three verses in his whole poem equal to these in Milton, so noble, yet clear; so simple, yet learned and elegant?

Audior? En facili rapior per inane volatu, &c.

MASENIUS.

This passage, says Mr Lauder, Milton has pass'd over; and, I think, 'twas necessary he should; since Masenius is now got above the clouds, and consequently out of sight.

Tu mihi tantarum, &c.

MASENIUS.

Say first, for heav'n, &c.

MILTON.

If there is any thing parallel in these passages, it is so very little, that the one can no more be thought

* Gen. i. 2.

thought to be an imitation of the other, than Virgil's description of a horse to be copied from Job. The similitude of thought arises from the imitation of nature, which is the same, and always will be so; and that from the identity of the subject, which was derived from the same stream of the holy scriptures, as the candid reader will find, by impartially comparing the passages of either poet. This and the foregoing reasons may be apply'd to vindicate our author from the last charge of plagiarism, in copying in more places than one Musenius's description of Paradise. I wish your correspondent had pointed them out, and told us where they were copy'd in Paradise Lost; for there are many descriptions of Paradise dispers'd thro' the poem, some of which consist of more than 100 lines. But Milton, who had Homer almost by heart, and comes nearest to his style of any poet, if he chose to transplant any flowers into his Garden of Eden, would certainly gather them from the gardens of Alcinous, which he almost confesses he has regarded.

——— Or where

Alcinous reign'd, fruit of all kinds, &c.

And again,

Spot more delicious than those gardens feign'd,
Or of reviv'd Adonis; or renown'd

Alcinous. Parad. Lost. ix. 439.

To crown the whole criticism, i. e. the whole invective against Milton, Mr Lauder concludes, cludes, That he that can imagine that Milton could have wrote as he had done, without ever seeing or hearing of Masenius's performance, may with equal reason assert, that a limner may draw a man's picture exactly like the original without ever seeing him : That is, in plain English, Milton's poem is exactly like Masenius's. But if I may be allow'd the presumption to oppose my judgment against so great a critic's authority, I would ask, Whether it is strange or absurd to suppose, that two pictures by two different hands should have a general likeness, which are drawn from the same original?

I am, SIR, Yours, &c.

R. R.

L E T T E R II.

—— Ignorantly read,
With loads of learned lumber in his head ;
With him most authors steal their works, or buy ;
Garth did not write his own Dispensary.

POPE's Essay on Criticism.

Mr URBAN,

MR Addison, who was not only a good poet, but a judicious critic; after having pointed out some lofty sentiments and daring flights of the great author of Paradise Lost,

Loft, affures his readers that he enter'd upon the imperfections of that divine poem, as a very ungrateful work : and by his own conduct and example strengthens his assertion, " That a true
 " critic ought to dwell rather upon excellen-
 " cies than imperfections, to discover the con" cealed beauties of a writer, and communi" cate fuch things as are worth their observati-
 " on." Of what ufe then can Mr Lauder's trivial charges againft Milton be to the learned world, who endeavours by his unjust assertions to depreciate the writings of that noble author, who is an honour not only to our nation, but to mankind in general ? But his air-drawn dagger, tho' levell'd at Milton's reputation, will fall fhort of its intended aim, and only make impreffion on the fhallo w judgments of a few half-read wits, who will greedily fwallow his assertions, whilft men of candour and learning will eafily difcern the true modern critic, whose thoughts are wholly turn'd upon detraction.

So fenfible was Mr Lauder of this, fo confcious of the gall in his own breast, that, to conceal his design, and make his charges more palatable, very formally declares, " that in or" der to prevent mistakes and misconstructi-
 " ons, he no way intended to derogate from
 " the glory or merit of that noble poet," &c.
 (Gent. Mag. Vol. xvii. p. 24 A.) But in the fequel of his writings he ftrangely forgets himfelf, and is glad of any opportunity to leffen
Milton's

Milton's reputation.——Mr Peck conjectures (and it is only a conjecture) that Milton translated Buchanan's Baptistes; but Mr Lauder wonderfully improves that hint, and heaps conjectures on conjectures. Mr Peck thinks that Milton (who was of an aspiring genius) designed to rival Shakespear, and to be prince of the English Drama, as he is of the Epic; and, to that intent, had form'd a design of writing those tragedies which are specified in the papers of his own hand-writing in Trinity-college library: But Mr Lauder, with his usual infallibility affirms, "That they were only titles of tragedies already written by learned men in Latin verse; I AFFIRM (says he) that Milton's Adam unparadis'd was only a translation of the Adamus Exul of Grotius." (Gent. Mag. p. 82 A). But how can this gentleman AFFIRM so positively this last assertion; for if Milton had intended merely to translate Grotius's tragedy, why did he form so many plans * of his Adam unparadis'd, and correct them so often? He could not be more peremptory if he had compar'd Milton's tragedies (which were never yet in being, or if they were, are lost) with those in Latin which bear the same titles. But by good luck Samson Agonistes (the only tragedy extant of Milton's) is among Mr Lauder's catalogue, and which he says is translated from Hieronymus Zieglerus. Now if he can prove this assertion (and what will

* They may be seen in Peck's memoirs of Milton.

will the world think of him if he cannot ?) it will much strengthen his authority, and ascertain his conjectures. But to bring no better reasons than he has done, that Milton is a servile translator, because others wrote before him on the same subjects, is strange logic indeed ! This argument (if it be an argument) proves too much, as the logicians say, and consequently nothing ; or, in other words, his charges are over-charg'd. For I may with equal reason assert, that Lee's and Dryden's Oedipus is only a translation of Seneca, because they wrote a tragedy on the same subject ; and that Seneca's Oedipus is copied from Sophocles, because that poet wrote the Oedipus Tyrannus before ; and 'twould be a pretty compliment to Mr Thompson to affirm that his tragedy of Agamemnon is but a copy, because one of Seneca's bears the same title. Besides, Mr Lauder seems to be acquainted with Milton's natural genius and temper, better than Milton was himself ; for he declares in his writings, “ That he never could “ delight in long citations, much less in whole “ traductions : whether (says he) it be natural “ disposition or education in me, or that my “ mother bore me a speaker of what God
 “ made mine own, and not a translator.” — Milton must be fond of translating indeed to employ himself with above 60 tragedies of other poets, and a notorious plagiarist to espouse them all for his own !

As we have not Grotius's tragedy entire, and as Mr Lauder seems not to have given us his full thoughts how much Milton may be indebted to that learned author, I shall defer my thoughts on that subject, and proceed to another work which he is pleas'd to consider, Mr A. Ramsay's Poemata Sacra. G. Mag. p: 189.

Here this gentleman's great zeal for the glory and merit of Milton appears in full view. 'Tis aut viam inveniam aut faciam with him. He is not only very sedulous to prove that the poet has stole from Ramsay, totidem sententiis, but will undertake with *Peter (who was a rare critic at such discoveries) to find him out totidem verbis; and who knows but at length he will proceed, with his brother projector, to totidem syllabis, or even to totidem literis? 'Tis a pity the poor man should be so hard driven for arguments, as to be obliged to assert that Milton calls Adam a man of clay, and son of despight, because "Ramsay also expressed the same sentiments before him." His words are terræ filius, and pulvere cretus; but where has he a word equivalent to son of despight in Mr Lauder's quotation? But granting he has—Are we not inform'd by holy writ, that "God formed man out of the dust of the ground?" Gen. ii. 7. Does not the word אָדָם, Adam, from אֶרֶץ Adamah, the earth, imply the same? Are not the scriptures as open for Milton as Mr Ramsay?—† Son of despight is a beautiful He-

* Tale of a tub.
ix. 189 and 653.

† See Paradise Lost, B. I. 501.

Hebraism (I hope Mr Lauder will allow that Milton understood Hebrew, tho' he will scarce allow him to be an author). Thus, not to mention many other instances in the sacred writings, the ‡ sparks are called sons of the fire in Job; and || arrows the sons of the quiver, in the Lamentations of Jeremiah in the original Hebrew. Agreeably to this, the day is called by Pindar, the child of the Sun. This manner of expression the poets improved in their fictions, and apply'd to characters in real life. Thus the heroes of antiquity, on account of some personal qualifications, are said to be the offspring of some particular deity. Romulus, Æsculapius, Æneas, Orpheus are the poetical sons of Mars, Apollo, Venus, and Calliope; thus G. S.* who confesses the muses to be a little out of his road, may properly be called a true son of of Mr Lauder and the Goddess Credulity. — Mr Lauder had dealt more fairly with his readers, if he had told them in what part of Milton's poem man of clay, and son of despight were to be found, that they might compare it with his quotation, and thereby be more able to judge and examine the truth of his assertion.

‡ Job v. 7. || Lament. iii. 13.

* This gentleman has so great an esteem for Mr Lauder's productions, and is so well persuaded of the truth of his assertions, as to conjecture that Milton contracted the epidemical disease of punning, or playing upon words, from Masenius! Gent. Mag. p. 202. But as I think I have proved that Parad. Lost was begun (and probably finished) before Masenius was publish'd, his superstructure must consequently sink with its foundation.

on. These expressions are in the speech of Satan, immediately before he enter'd into the Serpent, B. ix. v. 176. The reader will see their great propriety, by carefully considering the whole speech, and its particular circumstances (too long to be inserted here) but more especially these preceding verses:

—— Or, to spite us more,
Determin'd to advance into our room
A creature form'd of earth, and him endow,
Exalted from so base original,
With heav'nly spoils; our spoils.——
And immediately after,

—— And, O indignity!
Subjected to his service angel-wings,
And flaming ministers to watch and tend
Their earthly charge.——

I shall not obtrude my thoughts on this fine speech, nor descant upon this noble repetition, occasion'd by Satan's contempt of man's earthly original, but shall only desire the reader to apply the 20th section of Longinus, and the 11th section of the 4th Chap. of Mr Blackwall's Introduction to the classics.

“ Milton (says Mr Lauder) represents the de“ vil flattering Eve with lofty appellations, such
“ as sovereign of creatures! universal dame!” &c.
And what is the strong argument he produces to demonstrate that they cannot be Milton's own? Why, because Ramsay has said somewhat like it before

O terræ pelagique potens! &c.

This

This Argument being so infallible, so very convincing, and of which Mr Lauder is so very fond (and he had need, since it is really his only one) as to apply it to every conjecture he produces, methinks it very much resembles * Peter's universal pickle, on the virtue of which he so much rely'd as to apply it to every thing indifferently. Silence best suits these trivial cavils, these meer word-batteries; as the philosopher confuted an impertinent objection against motion only by walking:—— To write a formal answer to it, would be as absurd as discharging a large cannon at a wasp. — If he had ever read old Chaucer's wife of Bath's tale, or had been half an hour among the ladies before he took up his pen, the learned world would never have been indebted to him for this rare criticism.

Earth felt the wound, &c. Par. Lost, B. ix. v. 782.

Earth trembled from her entrails, &c. P. lost, B. ix.

Tum cælum inlabi, &c.

RAMSAY.

In the Latin verses there is scarce a word of Ramsay's own; 'tis a perfect cento from various parts of the Æneid. But Milton has caught fire from the Mantuan poet, and improv'd the blaze.

—— Prima & Tellus & pronuba Juno

Dant signum; fulsere ignes & conscius aether

Connubiis, summoque ulularunt vertice nymphæ.

Æneid. iv. 166.

* Tale of a Tub.

Ut

*Ut sanctum pectus non hoc penetrabile telo
Viderit, &c.*

RAMSAY.

——— With tract oblique

At first, as one who sought access, &c. MILTON.

I shall first consider the circumstances of these similes; Milton applies it to the serpent's wrappings and oblique motions; Ramsay to Satan tempting our Saviour. One would therefore be induc'd to think that if Milton had ever seen these lines of Ramsay, and intended to copy them, he would have inserted them in his Paradise Regain'd. But is it impossible (especially in similes, which are the resemblances of one thing in some of its modes to another) for two poets to have some thoughts which bear a near resemblance? Is not this confirm'd by daily experience? Have not the heathen philosophers and historians expressions exactly parallel to some passages in holy writ? We have reason to believe that some of them might be taken from scripture, but to affirm that they were all, would be a flagrant presumption. But perhaps what has been said will not satisfy Mr Lauder, who is very apt to suspect Milton. Let us therefore enquire whether there is any thing in the classics similar to this passage in Milton. I was once inclined to think that Milton had the fifth Æneid in his view, where the ship of the unfortunate Sergestus is compared to a serpent,

D

Nex-

Nexantem nodos, seque in sua membra plicantem.
Tali REMIGIO navis se tarda movebat.

There are some strokes in the beautiful description of a harmless serpent gliding about the tomb of Anchises, which bear a great affinity to Milton's, and might bring these verses of Virgil into his mind; and as the motion and working of a ship has been compar'd by Virgil to the motions of a serpent, could not Milton apply it vice versa? ——— But after all I find Milton to be his own best commentator; within three lines of the similitude are these remarkable words:

———— or the God

In Epidaurus. Par. Lost, ix. 506.

Here the poet points with his finger, as it were, to the 15th book of Ovid's Metamorphosis, where 'tis visible to any one that the English poet has trac'd the Roman throughout the whole fable of the transformation of Æsculapius; and from the various circumstances of the ship which carries into port the god in the serpent (parallel to which is Satan in the serpent in Paradise Lost) has composed this fine similitude, and like the Phrygian king turns all that he touches into gold.

I am, S I R, Yours, &c.

R. R.

I E T.

LETTER III.

————— False

Conjectures, fancies, built on nothing firm.

Parad. Regain'd.

MR Lauder, in his * answer to my first defence of Milton, has been pleas'd to charge me with wilful prevarication. I think it therefore incumbent on me to vindicate myself from this imputation, lest the reader should be byass'd with an opinion of my being an unfair disputant (with which title Mr Lauder has honoured me) and consequently give less credence to this, and my former defences of our English poet.

'Tis true, I asserted (p. 6) and here again repeat my assertion, That Paradise Lost was written between the year of Milton's blindness, 1650, and 1665. By this I did not affirm, that he began his poem precisely when he labour'd under the pain and misfortune of losing his eyes, but about that time (according to the universal consent of biographers) at least before Masenius was published; and that I thought was sufficient, since the passages in question were at the beginning of the poems of their respective authors. Mr John Richardson does not say expressly, but only that it was † probable that Milton did not assiduously apply himself to

* Gent. Mag. Aug. p. 364. † Life of Milton, p. 110.

to this work till the year 1660. But does this argue that Paradise Lost was not begun before? He might have made some progress in it by that time, but being diverted from this great work by other writings and obstructions, did not apply himself to Paradise Lost, and that only, till the Restoration.

I quoted Mr Richardson to prove that Paradise Lost was actually shewn as done to Elwood, one of Milton's intimate friends, in the year 1665. It might have been finished long before; and Milton, who was remarkably exact in his writings, might have taken some time in correcting and revising, and his friends in transcribing it. Mr Richardson must certainly be in an error to assert that Milton did not set about this work in earnest till the Restoration; for Paradise Lost was undoubtedly a work of time: It was no flashy production of haste, or the warm starts and fallies of an heated imagination, but of a close and well-digested reading, solid judgment, and indefatigable labour and application. * It is reported (and there are some passages in his † writings to countenance the tradition) that Milton's fancy made the happiest flights in the spring, and that he wrote

* Fenton's life of Milton. Edit. 1738. p. 26.

† Eleg. 6. In adventum Veris.
Pallor? an & nobis redeunt in carmina vires,
Ingeniumque mihi munere veris adest.

Par. Lost. B. ix. v. 44.— Unless an age too late, or cold
 Climate, or years, damp my intended wing
 Depress'd, ————

wrote Paradise Lost and the best of his other poems, in the spring and summer. Now, after these considerations, can it be reasonably supposed that an epic poem (which is said to be the greatest work that human nature is capable of) could be brought to perfection between the years 1660 and 1665? that the great, the sublime poem of Paradise Lost was the mushroom product of five years or less! He that can suppose this, may imagine that Rome and Constantinople were built in a day, or any thing else however absurd and impossible.

But as Mr Lauder has been so kind as to grant for argument, "that Milton began his poem in the year of his blindness 1650," I cannot but grant him something in return for that favour. What if, against the whole stream of biographers, I venture to assert that Milton began his poem before the Salmasian controversy? In defence of this assertion, I shall produce his own words in an extract of a letter to Henry Oldenburg, Anno 1654.—"These unforeseen controversies with the adversaries of liberty dragg'd me unwillingly intent upon very different and much more delightful subjects *." 'Tis to be consider'd likewise that

* Mr Richardson (from whose Life of Milton, p. 84. I have taken this extract) thinks nevertheless that at this time Milton was only entering upon his work. I submit the whole letter to the reader's consideration.—Mr Lauder does not deny that Milton's plan was form'd in the year 1654 (the very time that this letter was wrote, and Masenius that Milton was engaged in other writings of great length and labour, during the time of his blindness, some of which he completed. (See Wood's Fasti Oxon. Edit. 1721, p. 265). Milton's blindness subjected him to many inconveniences and disappointments; he was oblig'd to his friends to read to him, and write what he dictated; the decline of the Oliverian cause involv'd him in many perplexities; which, were there no other reasons, would persuade me that Paradise Lost was a work of time.

As Mr Lauder has thought fit to examine my account of the æra of Milton's poem, he cannot take it amiss if I examine that of Masenius.

Masenius is said to be published in 1654 or 1661. (Gent. Mag. Jan. p. 2.)—This word OR is equivocal, and bears two senses. It may signify that Masenius was published either in 1654 or 1661, 'twas doubtful which. I obliged Mr Lauder in supposing the former date, which I think was no small favour; for if I had taken the latter (which I might with equal reasenius publish'd) and consequently the words "intent upon very different and much more delightful subjects," are only a recapitulation of what goes before, "Now that I have done with these disputes, I prepare for other things, I know not whether more noble or more useful, &c."—These passages can only have a reference to Paradise Lost, upon which his mind was then intent. They more than hint that the tedious controversies in which Milton was engag'd, interrupted him in the progress of his poem, and having dispatch'd them, he prepar'd himself for a more noble work, Paradise Lost, which he resum'd again with fresh delight.

reason, as the dates are uncertain) it would have sunk his conjectures so low, as to render the interval of time very small between the publication of Masenius and the year 1665, when Paradise Lost was in manuscript, which (as I have observ'd) might have been finished some time before.——But the word OR may import that Masenius's poem underwent two impressions, one in the year 1654, the other in 1661; and consequently must be much approv'd by the learned. So that among the enemies of Milton, one at least might easily have detected him, and attack'd his fame, when his poem and that of Masenius (which was then in repute, and the copies not scarce, supposing two editions to have been publish'd) first appeared in the world; and some antiquarian in his laborious researches, out of dear envy or pride, might have stript him of his borrow'd plumes. But none of these, not even a Dennis, have dar'd such indignities to the poet before Mr Lauder.

I am sensible that it will be objected here, that if Milton wrote any part of his Paradise Lost before his blindness, it was little or nothing; the first or second books at most; since he mentions his loss of sight at the beginning of the 3d book. I do not pretend to say how far our great author proceeded in his work, but only that his plan was determin'd, or perhaps his poem begun before his blindness. Nor can this objection determine that the 2d book must be

be the last that Milton wrote before he was depriv'd of the use of his eyes ; since the Hymn to Light is not, properly speaking, a part of the poem, but only an excrecence (as Mr Addison calls it) and might be inserted afterwards. The 3d book might begin with,

Now had th' Almighty Father from above,
From the pure Emphyrean, &c.

which bears a close and immediate connection with the end of the 2d book.

Nor does this lay me open to another objection that might be alledg'd, That tho' Milton might have made some considerable progress in his poem, yet upon seeing Masenius's performance afterwards, he might copy the beginning from him. But the exordium of the poem (as I observed p. 8) is a short sketch of the whole poem in miniature, and the Hymn to Light only an excrecence of the poem, which might be inserted or omitted at the author's pleasure ; so that if Milton had formed his plan and compos'd his poem according to it, it was impossible for him to write his exordium otherwise than he has done, or copy it from Masenius, unless he had expung'd his former labours, and begun his poem afresh. If we may judge of Masenius's character as a poet, from the specimens and plan that Mr Lauder has given us, I cannot think that the fame of his poem could spread so far as these kingdoms, or so quick as to afford Milton the opportunity of taking advantage from it as soon as publish'd, and therefore, if Milton had ever heard of this choice work, it must have been very late, and Paradise Lost almost finish'd. Nor does Masenius's poem seem to me to be so very exquisite, nor Milton's want of art and genius so very great, as to oblige him to borrow the plan and beginning of his poem from the Jesuit. Mr Addison has bestow'd the greatest encomiums on Milton's exordium, which he never would have done, if it had been botch'd up with some of his own thoughts and some of another's, or, as Horace expresses it,

——— Unus & alter
Affuitur pannus.

But if any one will venture to affirm that Milton might have wrote his beginning afterwards, he may readily subscribe to the ingenious scheme of Gulliver's feather-headed projector, who (to go out of the common road) propos'd to build a house, and begin his airy structure at the top.

I proceed now to the next work that Mr Lauder has cut out for me, "To shew how it should happen that the infernal council, or Pandæmonium; Lucifer's habit and chariot; the fight of the angels; the excursion of the fallen spirits from hell, became common to both authors."

The great Mr Locke judiciously observes,* that we must not entertain any proposition with greater assurance than the proofs it is built upon will warrant.—For the evidence that any proposition is true (except such as are self-evident) lying only in the proofs a man has of it, whatsoever degrees of assent he affords it beyond the degrees of that evidence, 'tis plain that surplusage of assurance is owing to some other affection, and not the love of truth. How then can Mr Lauder expect a direct answer to these slight accusations, to confirm which he can bring no solid and satisfactory proof? Would he have me convert a shadow into substance, or build a structure without materials? How can I or any one else that never saw the poem of Masenius. be assured that it contains any of these heads? Or if it did, can I tell what thoughts, words or expressions are contained in these out-lines? A painter may with equal reason shew me a portrait which he had just chalk'd out, and demand of me an exact description of the features and complexion of the face, and colour of the drapery. What authority does he produce, that these, and the other marginal heads he produces in January Magazine are really in Masenius?—his own. On what sufficient grounds is this charge against Milton built?—Why truly, his own infallible memory and impartiality, of which he has given us some excellent specimens in his writings. Are these slight assertions, these ipse dixits sufficient to tear the laurel that Milton has so long deservedly wore? This gentleman is not only plaintiff, but jury and umpire in his own cause:

E

ON

* Chapter of Enthusiasm. Sect. I.

and

and therefore I would advise him for the future to forbear taxing any one with being an unfair disputant. If he would maintain the opposite character, I would recommend these lines of Horace to his consideration:

—— Volet hæc sub luce videri,

Judicis argutum quæ non formidat acumen.

But under all these difficulties, I must cleanse this Augean stable, and that in the dark, in which my antagonist has for good reasons intrench'd himself, and am constrain'd to cry out with the distress'd Greek in Homer,

Ζεῦ πάτερ, ἀλλὰ σὺ ῥύσαι ὑπ' ἥρος υἱας Ἀχαιῶν,
Ποίντων δ' ἄθρην, δὲ δ' ἐρταλμοῖσιν ἰδέσθαι.
'Εν δὲ ράει ἤ ὀλεσσόν——. Iliad. P. v. 645.

Yet I will venture, tho' on such unequal and unfair terms, to prove that Milton was no imitator of Masenius.

Among the marginal heads in January Magazine is Concilium inferorum, sive Pandæmonium, the infernal council, or Pandæmonium.

I shrewdly suspect that the two last words are a gloss of Mr Lauder's to support a bad cause.—Be that as it will, it appears from the word or that Masenius has only an infernal council; Milton has one (perhaps not a word of it like Masenius) and a† Pandæmonium too, which are two things, and as different from each other as the grand council of this nation and the parliament—

† A gentleman informs me that the word Pandæmonium is exactly conformable to Panætolum, and other words of the like nature in Plutarch.

liament-house.—But I will not obtrude my own words, when I can bring Milton to answer for himself. “Pandæmonium, the palace of Satan, rises suddenly out of the deep [is that copy’d from Masenius?] the infernal peers there sit in council.”—Argument of the 1st B.

Milton, in imitation of his favourite Homer, begins his poem with an infernal council. I say in imitation of Homer, not of Masenius. The Jesuit’s is in all respects different from Milton’s. Paradise Lost opens with an infernal council, which is continu’d and brought to an end in the 2d book, and takes up a great part of the poem. But that of Masenius seems not to be of any great length, and (according to the place Mr Lauder has assign’d it in his marginal heads) I guess ’tis in the middle of his poem, at least very far from the beginning. And if the persons in council are Mors, Senectus, Curæ, Labor, Luētus, Paupertas, Fames, Dolus, they must speak in character, and consequently there cannot be a speech in this council like any in Milton. Neither are the streams from whence these two poets deriv’d their characters, the same. Milton takes them from holy writ, Masenius from the 6th Æneid.

*Vestibulum ante ipsum primisque in faucibus Orci
Luētus & ultrices posuere cubilia Curæ;
Pallentisque habitant Morbi, tristisque Senectus,
Et Metus, & male suada Fames, & turpis Egestas, Terribiles visu formæ, Letumque Labosque.*
These seem to be the inferno erumpentes Furie riæ in Masenius; one of which (Deceit) persuades Eve to eat the forbidden fruit. That these are the infernal spirits is plain from Mr Lauder's translation of inferno erumpentes Furia, the excursion of the fallen spirits from hell.

But this is wide from any thing that I can find in Paradise Lost.——Satan indeed, in the 2d book, passes from hell to this world to work the destruction of mankind, and after the fall of man, Sin and Death

Following his track (such was the will of heav'n)
Pav'd after him a * broad and beaten way
Over the dark abyfs.—— ii. 1025.

These are the only fallen spirits in Milton that make their excursion from hell. And as yet the beautiful allegory of Sin and Death is wholly Milton's own; for I don't find that Mr Lauder has attempted to wrest that from him. 'Tis hinted indeed that after Sin and Death had pav'd the way from hell to our earth

—— The spirits perverse
With easy intercourse pass to and fro
To punish mortals.—— ii. 1030.

And in the 10th book,

—— A monument
Of merit high to all th' infernal host;
Easing their passage hence for intercourse
Of transmigration as their lot shall lead.

x. v. 258.

And

And again, in Satan's speech to the infernal angels.

—— A * broad way now is pav'd
To expedite your glorious march. ——

But whatever be Masenius's excursion of the Furies from hell, 'tis different from Milton's both in matter (as was prov'd before) and in circumstances ; for in Masenius it is before the fall of man (see the marginal heads in Jan. Mag. p. 26 B.) in Milton an immediate consequence of it ; the former is contrary, the latter exactly conformable to scripture.

But he [Satan] once past soon after when man fell,
Strange alteration, Sin and Death amain
Following his track, &c. ii. 1023.

Milton's sublime genius, only from a small hint in the sacred or profane writings, has form'd some very material circumstances in his poem. I shall only trouble the reader with an instance of each.

From two small passages in scripture, 2 Cor. xi. v. 14. For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light ; and Rev. xix. v. 17. I saw an angel standing in the sun, arose that noble and important circumstance of Satan and Uriel at the end of the third book, and which gave occasion to the greatest part of the fourth.

From this passage of Virgil

—— Strictisque seges mucronibus horret
Ferrea. Aen. xii.

Nay

* Matt. vii. v. 13.

Nay, from the single word seges our poet has struck out a simile, which neither Phæbus nor his son Homer might blush to own,

—— And began to hem him round
With darted spears, as thick as when a field
Of Ceres, &c. iv. 980.

The same noble genius has extracted from several parts of scripture (not taking his eye from the Classics) the whole allegory of Sin and Death; 'tis foreign to my purpose to point them out severally; the following passages will sufficiently prove that the excursion of Sin and Death, and afterwards of the fallen angels in Milton, are not copied from Masenius. And I looked, and behold, a pale horse (see Parad. Lost, x. 589.) and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell (i. e. the powers of hell) followed with him; and power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, &c. Rev. vi. v. 8. By one man Sin entred into the world, and Death by Sin. Rom. v. v. 12. Many passages in Paradise Lost induce me to think that Milton did not forget the 9th chapter of the Revelations when he compos'd this fine allegory. —But I forget my task, I am not a commentator but a defender of Milton.

If my defence was as short as Mr Lauder's proofs, that Milton copied Satan's habit and chariot from Masenius, 'twou'd be little better than silence, which best suits such groundless cavils. Are not such descriptions to be found in

in the works of the antients? Homer and Virgil have chariots and habits both of gods and men; Milton might consult them and the other poets of antiquity. But granting they have no such descriptions, our great poet, who (whatever Mr Lauder thinks of him) is not inferior to any of the antients, whose divine muse could describe a creation with ease and sublimity, could not be at a loss to furnish the Apostate with a chariot. He might have wrote

High in the midst exalted as a god
Th' Apostate, in his sun-bright chariot sat
Idol of majesty divine——

tho' he had never consulted antiquity, tho' Homer and Virgil (much less an unnoted Jesuit) had never been born.—'Tis a pity Mr Lauder's memory, which could supply him with a hundred or two lines at the beginning of Masenius, should fail him here; that we should be deprived of the opportunity of comparing (if there be any comparison between them) the Latin and the English poets. But this would bring affairs too much into the light (of which he is very shy) and consequently his arguments would be easily seen thro'.

If Mr Lauder had the luck to prove his assertion, that Milton has copied from Masenius the Gigantomachia, or, as he translates it, the fight of the Angels, he would take the whole sixth book of Paradise Lost from him: but this he never will be able to do, till he has expung'd pung'd the battle of the Titans out of Hesiod and the classics, and these verses out of St John's Revelation. And there was war in heaven. Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels; and prevailed not, neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.

Our author in composing his poem has consulted the Revelation of St John more than any book in holy writ; from whence (if necessary) I could deduce the revolt of the angels in the fifth book of Paradise Lost, and many other circumstances relating to the battle of the angels. I will add this general remark, which will serve as a test to try the standard of Mr Lauder's assertions, that Milton is an imitator of Masenius. In his other charges against the Poet he only picks out some passages of a few lines, which he produces as parallel to others in Milton. But he taxes Milton with borrowing from Masenius by the lump. He would take away from him not only the main part of Paradise Lost, viz. the whole exordium of his poem, the battle of the Angels, &c. but even the whole plan. One would therefore imagine that Masenius's was a large work, at least equa in length to Paradise Lost. But Paradise Lost consists of twelve books and near 11,000 lines, and Masenius's poem, according to Mr Lauder's account, only of five books, and 2500 lines.

F and

I am surprized that Mr Lauder should bring this last injurious accusation to diminish the Poet's reputation ; if he had ever read (which he undoubtedly has) the 333d Spectator before he undertook that ungrateful task. I shall beg leave, for the further vindication of Milton, to transcribe the great Mr Addison's words in the aforesaid Spectator : “ We are in some measure prepar'd for such an incident by the description of the giant's war, which we meet with among the antient poets. What still made the circumstance the more proper for the poet's use, is the opinion of many learned men, that the fable of the giant's war, which makes so great a noise in antiquity, and gave birth to the sublimest descriptions in Hesiod's works, was an allegory founded upon this very tradition of a fight between the good and bad angels.”

The Adamus Exul of Grotius is another work that Mr Lauder has produc'd, and on which he expects I should give my thoughts. That Milton did not intend to translate this tragedy I have prov'd already, p. 15 ; but that he has borrow'd some phrases of that learned author, I do not pretend to disprove.*

But

* A gentleman who signs C. B. has anticipated me in proving that the quotations from Paradise Lost, in February Magazine, might be Milton's own, without drawing to his assist-

But, nevertheless, there are some passages which Mr Lauder has produced as parallel, that affistance any thought of Grotius's, or any one else. He has omitted Nam me judice, &c. which Mr Lauder says, Milton has literally translated, and on which he expects my opinion.—I shall therefore consider this and Mr Lauder's quotations in June Magazine, p. 286. 'Tis probable that Milton has copied this sentence from Grotius. But by the way, I must observe, that the thought is not Grotius's own, he has taken it from Æschylus.

— ἐκ ἀν' ἀλλάζαιμ' ἐγώ

Κρεῖσσον γὰρ ὄμαι τῇδε λατρεῦειν πέτρῃ,

Ἡ πατρὶ φύναι Ζηνὶ πῖσον ἄγχιλον.

Προμ. Δεσμ. 966.

Of all the quotations that Mr Lauder has produc'd in p. 286, Milton, in my opinion, is obliged to his friend Grotius only for the four last, which is such a trifle, that none but Mr Lauder would have concluded on such slight grounds, "that Milton was not so much an original author as he has been reputed."

I shall now briefly consider the other quotations in that page, which will be a supplement to Mr G. B.'s observations, Gent. Mag. pag. 423.

Age si vacabit, &c.

Deign to descend, &c.

GROTIUS.

MILTON.

'Tis evident that, in the mutual discourse of the angel Raphael and Adam, that Milton had Virgil's beautiful Episode of the Trojan war in his mind. Here Milton has not imitated Grotius, but the request of Dido to Æneas to relate the particular circumstances of the destruction of Troy, in these words,

Immo age, & a primâ, dic hospes origine, &c.

Æn. i. 757.

Innominata quæque nominibus suis, &c. GROTIUS.

Things by their names I call, tho' yet unnam'd.

MILTON.

The

that might arise purely from the identity of the thought, which the common subject naturally

The 11th and 12th books of Paradise Lost are noted imitations of the sixth Æneid, from whence Milton has imitated, or rather translated this verse :

Hæc tum nomina erunt, nunc sunt sine nomine terræ.

Æn. vi. 777.

Terrestris orbis rector, &c.

GROTIUS.

Offspring of heav'n and earth, and all earth's lord.

MILTON.

This and the following quotations are founded on the common subject, and therefore Masenius, or any other poet that chose this subject for heroic song, as Milton and Grotius have done, might have these parallel expressions, and not be thought to copy from each other. Need I quote the 26th and 28th verses of the first book of Genesis, compar'd with Par. Lost, viii. 338, or Ovid's Metam. i. 77?

Nata Deo atque homine sata.

GROTIUS.

Daughter of God and man, immortal Eve.

Par. Lost, ix. 291.

Empress of this fair world, resplendent Eve. ix. 568.

Sov'reign of creatures, universal dame. ix. 612.

Here again Mr Lauder's zeal for the glory and merit of Milton, and his high esteem for that noble poet, appear with a witness! I have pointed out where these places are to be found, to shew with what labour and diligence he picks up these three lines from various parts of the ninth book, and makes them (what they were never before) such close neighbours. If this is fair criticising, no writer must pretend to call any thing his own. But—the surprising shortness of Mr Lauder's memory!—we are told (Feb. Mag. p. 189 F) that these expressions are copied from Ramsay. See p. 19.

A thought or expression which we approve, and which is rally suggested. But, granting that Milton was much more indebted to Grotius than he is, it would not be difficult to account for it, without any injury to our author's deserv'd reputation. We are told by Mr Fenton that he was introduced to the acquaintance of Grotius by Lord Scudamore; undoubtedly the learned conversation of two such eminent men as Milton and Grotius contracted a mutual esteem and friendship. And (as men are naturally fond of their first productions) it is not improbable that Grotius might make our poet a present of his tra-

is adherent to the subject we are intent upon, frequently arises in our minds and is repeated in our discourse; it proves itself to be our own, and not another's, by the fondness we express for it.—So two of these quotations occur in other places in Paradise Lost.

—— Son of heav'n and earth. v. 519.

Daughter of God and Man, accomplish'd Eve. iv. 660.

These and the like endearing expressions begin almost every speech of Adam and Eve, and are perfectly suitable to their state of innocence, and happy imitations of Homer and Virgil. If Milton regards one place more than another, I think 'tis the beginning of the speeches of Jupiter and Juno, in the 11th Æneid.

O germana mihi atque eadem gratissima conjux. x. 607.

—— O pulcherrime conjux. x. 611.

The description of the serpent is Milton's own.—If he had intended not to rely totally on the force of his own genius, he might have recourse to Homer, Virgil, Ovid, &c. whose descriptions surpass that of Grotius.—Milton here has follow'd the opinion of the Fathers, that the serpent mov'd in a more erect posture before the fall of man, when the curse was pronounced on him. Gen. iii. 14.

tragedy, which was one of the amusements of his youth. Milton might highly value that work, not only for its intrinsic worth, but for the esteem he had for its author. The most shining parts of it might warm his fertile imagination (as those of Homer and Virgil did before) which time impaired not, but improv'd. But is a charge or an accusation (to use Mr Lauder's own decent expressions) to be brought against Milton for this? Are not Tasso and Spencer both moderns? Yet Milton has taken several hints and expressions from the first, and acknowledged himself that the latter was his original. But not one of Milton's most inveterate enemies ever charg'd or accus'd him for imitating these great authors. Virgil has some lines in common with Lucretius, Ennius, and Theocritus, and Hesiod with Homer; and Virgil and Horace are more indebted to Homer and Pindar, than Milton to Grotius; yet we do not find that they were calumniated for it by the Baviuss of antiquity. Good sense and sublimity of thought are the same in all authors, ancient or modern; their own merit, not their antiquity, render them sterling: they engaged Milton's esteem wherever he found them, from whatever source they were derived; nor did he despise a well-invented novel or fable, tho' the Iliad was in his hand. As to Milton's inserting some of Grotius's thoughts in the texture of his poem, I in some measure agree with Mr Lauder, as to the matter, not the manner of his pro-

proceedings. He accuses where he ought to commend. If, after the manner of that true critic Mr Addison, his intent had been to illustrate the Poet, by comparing his work with that of Grotius, he should not only have my hearty thanks, but the approbation of the whole learned world. But as his intent and main design is to injure Milton's fame, and depreciate his noble and valuable writings, he will gather weeds where he expected laurels.

I am, S I R, Yours, &c.

R. R.

F I N I S.

proceedings. The story where he came to comment. It was the manner of the critic Mr. [?], the interest had been to the heart the [?], by comparing his work with that of Goethe, he should not only take my heart's things, but the appreciation of the whole learned world. I see his intent and his it is to [?] the [?] and [?]
 see the noble and valuable writings, the way gather words where he expected [?]

I am, Sir, Yours,
 J. A.

G I N I S

